Wilder's Better Choice

In 1839, when R.G. Wilder, missionary to India and founder of the Missionary Review of the World, graduated from Middlebury College, he divided first honours with his classmate, Foote. Strange to say, both had been born in the same year and on the same day.

Foote became a lawyer and rose rapidly in his profession. He amassed wealth and married a young woman of singular beauty. But in the midst of his prosperity, death took wife and daughter from him and, overcome with sorrow, he blew his brains out.

When Wilder turned from flattering prospects at home to devote his life to India, his twin-honour man said to him, "Why bury yourself among the heathen, Wilder?" Wilder worked in India more than thirty years, preached in more than 3,000 cities and villages, scattered more than three million pages of tracts, and gathered into schools over 3,300 children of whom 300 were girls. He had Christ; his twin-honour friend Foote had not. Was not Wilder's the better choice? - Naismith
