"I lifted up my eyes and looked, and behold, a man clothed in linen, with a belt of fine gold from Uphaz around his waist. His body was like beryl, his face like the appearance of lightning, his eyes like flaming torches, his arms and legs like the gleam of burnished bronze, and the sound of his words like the sound of a multitude."

Church Family,

This week I answered a question on Facebook about how the New Living Translation (NLT) compared to the Christian Standard Bible (CSB). I received some positive feedback in response to what I wrote, so I thought it would be helpful to share a slightly edited version of my comment here.

The NLT and the CSB are both modern translations. The NLT was first published 25 years ago and the CSB began around 20 years ago. Both translation committees were comprised of nearly 100 of the world's leading scholars in the interpretation of the Bible's ancient languages (Hebrew, Aramaic, and Koine Greek). Both versions are very easy to read, yet they were driven by two different translation philosophies.

There are two main approaches to Bible translation. The first seeks to interpret the original languages into our modern English with as close to a word-for-word translation as possible (e.g., NASB & ESV). The second seeks to do more of a phrase-for-phrase translation coming from the original languages for the sake of a more beautiful and less wooden or mechanical-sounding translation (e.g., NLT, NIV). The first group claims accuracy as its forte, while the second aims for being easier to read, while still working to be as accurate as possible.

There are advantages to both groups. I think there are very many modern Bible translations that are great. I preach from the ESV and have for many years. As a result our pew Bibles are in the ESV and most of the Scriptures we display on screen during our worship services are also in the ESV. However, this year my personal devotions are in the CSB. And for the past two years my personal devotions were from the NLT.

So what about the comparison between the CSB and the NLT? The NLT is incredibly easy to read and that is a huge plus. The CSB claims to have taken a balanced approach to translation, using a word-for-word philosophy where it was most advantageous and a thought-for-thought translation where easier readability and accurate translation were both possible. I have found that the CSB does about as good a job at being both accurate and easy to read as any version I've come across. So right now I'm pretty high on the CSB.

One last thing: I find that most believers don't care a whole lot about these sorts of things (and that's fine!). They just want a Bible that they can read and understand and that they think is good (i.e., accurate). So I always tell people there are LOTS of great translations out there. And for 99% of the people I know, the best translation is whichever one that they'll actually use.
