The Green Will Return

By Michael Orr

Though The grasses may wither
and give up their breath,
Though The flowers all wilt,
Turning beauty to death,

Though the fall is relentless
And the winter is stern,
The time is approaching,
When the green will return.

No bending or breaking
This pact they have made,
Where the seasons hold vigil,
And each part has been played.

For the fallen give room,
As the new growth will learn,
That their pathway is ready
When the green will return.

And I weep over roses,
Who wilt after season,
As their petals lie down,
Casting doubt on my reason.

For why must their glory,
Grow swiftly and burn?
But their wick holds the candle,
When the green will return.

So as green turns to brown,
In a blanket of blue,
I rejoice in the blending,
Of old things and new,

For my heart holds the promise,
As I quietly yearn,
For the day of renewal,
When the green will return.
